Eyes for Avonlea: Montgomery's Affective Vision of Nature

Published on
Fri, 06/26/2020 - 15:52

Birch skin, shadowed wood, patches of dappled light, endless varieties of dusk and dawn, prismatic colours of the sea: surpassing mere descriptive prose, Montgomery’s rendering of nature thoroughly registers how nature impresses upon and affects the assemblages surrounding it. In order to present Montgomery’s configuration of nature as an affective strata, I will look at several passages from Anne of Green Gables. Then, I will explore how this affective rendering of nature teaches readers to see nature with new eyes, eyes for Avonlea, which transform attentive observation into a mode of response that recognizes how entwined and generative elements of nature are. Both organic (i.e. tree leaves) and inorganic (i.e. moonlight), nature thus becomes a force that matters, enfolded and unfolding with us. This paper will especially utilize the superb introduction to L.M. Montgomery and the Matter of Nature(s) by Rita Bode and Jean Mitchell. In also using texts like Gilles Deleuze’s Spinoza: Practical Philosophy and Jane Bennett’s The Enchantment of Modern Life, I hope to continue to extend the critical conversations about Montgomery and nature from key concerns of aesthetics and Romanticism into the foci and lexicon of affectivity, which might offer new insights into Montgomery’s work as pedagogic encounter and nature (and an author’s capture of it) as affectual – inaugural and transformative – force.

About the Author: Jessica Brown, born and raised in southeast Texas, now lives with her husband and son in County Clare in Ireland. With an MA in English from Boston College, an MFA in Creative Writing from Seattle Pacific, she is now a Creative Writing PhD student at University of Limerick, where she is studying narrative theory and affect theory and working on a fiction project. Her poetry collection And Say was released with Revival Press in October 2019, and her children's novel The River Boy was released in 2016 with the indie-press Finch and Fellow. Her academic articles have been published in the Journal for Spiritual Formation and Soul Care and in the book Jane Austen and the Arts. She also had the privilege of editing Faustin Ntamushoboru’s book on forgiveness and the Rwandan genocide, Transformation Through the Different Other, and she is on the Governing Council for Thousand Hills International University, a young university in northwest Rwanda.

Get in Touch: Email Jessica at jessica.brown@ul.ie and check out her website!

Article Info

Copyright: Jessica Brown, 2020. This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License.

Peer reviewed
No