Down the valley,
she is whitewashed
and low.

Earnest eaves stick out,
like tongues waving welcomes
and warnings;
hold onto those leather straps!
Keep the books dry!

Windows invite tapping,
allow for sneaking looks,
peekings in at
mouthy desks carved
with dull love letters,
edged with dust.

Pink crumbs from
raspberry tarts shared scatter
among girls
who wander then

cluster the stoop,
whispering about slate slams.

She sits comfortably,
nestled in
among fussy fir branches that shake at those who scamper past,
late again from imagining ghosts.

The brook sticks close to her—a natural ally.
She too hums knowingly and
also stays down,
her attention remaining on cooling milk
and
hot hands with easy babbling.

Together, both quietly hold autumn close, capturing leaves in the doorway or washing them downstream, shushing crinkling just in time for poetry hour.
