

The Idea of Place

Published on

Thu, 04/03/2025 - 11:16

On 15 May 1970, I took the ferry from Caribou, Nova Scotia, to Wood Islands, PEI. The sun was shining. The patchwork of red soil and green fields against the blues of sky and the Northumberland Strait took my breath away. I had not yet read Montgomery's work.

I have not yet recovered from my initial enchantment with this little red-clay island in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It is my home, and it is the home and setting of many of my characters: Brupp, the Island cat who sets out to see the world; Lena of Lena and the Whale; Lee of Lobster in My Pocket; Ella in Home for Christmas; and it is the destination of the main characters of my adult novel, Darwin's Hornpipe.

My first experience with Montgomery's writing was through the eyes of children when I read aloud Anne of Green Gables to my grade three class at a rural school, Vernon River Consolidated School, where I taught for seven years. Daily we would huddle together by the one window, all of us on low chairs, while I read aloud Charlotte's Web, Owls in the Family, and other favourite children's books. Because of all the fuss about Montgomery in my new home province, one spring I chose Anne of Green Gables from the school library to read a chapter a day to the children. I did not first read the novel myself, and when we came to the chapter, "The Reaper Whose Name Is Death," my throat thickened as I read: "Anne dropped her flowers and sprang across the kitchen to him at the same moment as Marilla. They were both too late; before they could reach him Matthew had fallen across the threshold" (Montgomery 314). Tears filled my eyes. I stopped reading and sat in silence on the little chair, surrounded by the tight semicircle of children, all of us silent and still. I couldn't read any further, couldn't stand the sorrow of Matthew's death.

I had come to love all of the children in the class. I'd been their grade two teacher and had requested I follow them to grade three; the next year I followed them to grade four. We all sat in sorrow until one of the children, Gregory, said, “I didn’t know a teacher could cry.”

My life as a writer began in earnest the moment I was caught in the web of “real” landscape and the landscape described by Montgomery and imagined by all her readers. Montgomery created a literary landscape that transcends the literary: it is a place where there is licence to write, to create art, a place that offers the freedom to be oneself, just as Anne both found and created a niche where she could express her personality, mind, heart, soul, and spirit.

---

An earlier version of this piece by Deirdre Kessler called “L.M. Montgomery and the Creation of Prince Edward Island” was the epilogue to L.M. Montgomery and Canadian Culture, edited and introduced by Irene Gammel and Elizabeth Epperly. Published and copyrighted by University of Toronto Press, 1999. Reprinted with permission of the publisher.

Bio: Deirdre Kessler was project manager, fundraiser, and co-creator with Dr. Elizabeth Epperly and Dr. Anne-Louise Brookes of the L.M. Montgomery Institute’s award-winning CD-ROM The Bend in the Road: The Life and Works of L.M. Montgomery. For many years Deirdre has taught creative writing, children’s literature, and the course on L.M. Montgomery with the English Department of the University of Prince Edward Island. She is the author of twenty-eight books of fiction, non-fiction, and poetry, including a recently published novel, Darwin's Hornpipe.

Article Info

 Copyright: Deirdre Kessler, 2025. This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (Creative Commons BY 4.0), which allows the user to share, copy, and redistribute the material in any medium or format and adapt, remix, transform, and build upon the material for any purpose, even commercially, PROVIDED the Licensor is given attribution in accordance with the terms and conditions of the CC BY 4.0.

Peer reviewed

No

Works Cited

Montgomery, L.M. Anne of Green Gables. 1908. McClelland and Stewart, 1992.

Banner image: Author photo. Submitted by Deirdre Kessler.